

Development

peacebuilding through justice

This issue of Development on peacebuilding through justice is timed to be published when the United Nations Millennium Summit is held in New York, September 2005. It is difficult to predict the outcome of the Summit, but like the debate over the Millennium Development Goals, many within the international system are fearing that this Summit is one of the last moments to defend the multilateral development agenda and the role of the UN in peacekeeping.

Development 48.3 explores how the security agenda is intertwined with the development agenda. They are not only two pillars of the multilateral system, along with human rights, but those working on development and peacebuilding share a sense of growing pessimism and mistrust in transnational institutions being able to deliver.

The articles are written by those involved in conflicts and in the politics of post-conflict reconstruction in regions of the global south as well as in the East and Middle East. They raise many of the issues familiar to Development readers. Given the concerns to be raised at the Millennium Summit it is critical that the links between the poverty trap and what the World Bank in 1997 labeled the 'conflict trap' are explored.
